

Dr Naomi Salmon is a lecturer and researcher in the School of Law at Aberystwyth University, where she has been based since the late 1990s. She teaches across a variety of areas of law, including food policy and law. Her research addresses key issues of food governance, with a particular focus on the utility of the language of human rights as a catalyst for constructive policy-shift towards a more sustainable and socially just food system. In her spare time, Naomi indulges her passion for the great outdoors and traditionally baked bread. She runs a small bakery business from her home, volunteers at her local community gardens, and has also worked with local activists and educators on grassroots food projects.
